IV. Chair's summary of the key points of the discussions

35. At its 1st meeting, on 14 July, the Working Group agreed to include the Chair's summary of the key points of the discussions in the report of the session. The Chair's summary reads as follows:

Chair's summary of the key points of the discussions at the sixth session of the Open-ended Working Group on Ageing established for the purpose of strengthening the protection of the human rights of older persons

The sixth session of the Working Group has allowed us to further deepen our knowledge of the matters that we have been working on in previous sessions.

Both during the general debate and the interactive exchange of views that took place afterwards, delegations emphasized how important it was for the United Nations to continue to address issues related to the protection of the human rights of older persons. In that context, the relevance of the mandate of the Working Group was reaffirmed.

As in previous years, some delegations stressed that a greater protection of the human rights of older persons could be reached through the better and more efficient implementation of existing instruments and mechanisms, including the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002.

Conversely, other delegations, organizations of civil society and several panellists emphasized that the goal of greater protection could only be reached through a specific international legal instrument encompassing all human rights of older persons.

In spite of those differences, there continued to be important common positions to all participants, namely:

(a) That, as a result of the increase in the life expectancy and ageing of the world population, older persons are key actors in our societies from the economic, social and political points of view. That requires a change of paradigm: older persons should not be considered passive subjects who receive assistance from the State, but rather active subjects who should be able to fully exercise their human rights and demand that they be respected;

(b) That the existing mechanisms designed to guarantee the full exercise of the civil, political, social, economic and cultural rights of older people have flaws, either because there are deficiencies in terms of their implementation, as some States maintain, or because there is a normative gap at the international level that must be filled through the adoption of a universal legally binding instrument to address issues such as ill treatment, exclusion, stigmatization, discrimination and the satisfaction of basic needs of older persons.

That is why the mandate of the Working Group has a special relevance and validity, as it is the only intergovernmental mechanism within the framework of the United Nations established to discuss the best way to increase the protection of the human rights of older people.

At this point, I believe it is important for us to recall once again the mandate that has been entrusted to the Working Group by the General Assembly.

In accordance with General Assembly resolution 65/182, the Working Group should dedicate itself to strengthening the protection of the human rights of older persons by examining the current international framework of human rights of older persons and determining their possible deficiencies and the best way to improve them, including through the study, where applicable, of the viability of new instruments and measures.

But as I mentioned last year and what I would like to reiterate today, part of our mandate is also what the General Assembly decided in paragraph 1 of its resolution 67/139: that the Working Group should “consider proposals for an international legal instrument to promote and protect the rights and dignity of older persons, based on the holistic approach in the work carried out in the fields of social development, human rights and non-discrimination, as well as gender equality and the empowerment of women”. In addition, paragraph 2 of that resolution requested the Working Group to “present to the Assembly, at the earliest possible date, a proposal containing, inter alia, the main elements that should be included in an international legal instrument to promote and protect the rights and dignity of older persons, which are not currently addressed sufficiently by existing mechanisms and therefore require further international protection”.

I believe we all know well that the fact that a resolution, as is the case with General Assembly resolution 67/139, is adopted through a vote does not mean that it has less value than resolutions adopted by consensus. That has been the sound practice of the United Nations since its inception, in the General Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council or other bodies, and it is in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the rules of procedures that guide our work.

Therefore, beyond any doubt, the provisions of resolution 67/139 are part and parcel of the mandate of the Working Group.

During the six sessions of the Group has held since 2011, we have been able to revisit most aspects of the situation of the human rights of older persons worldwide.

We have also had opportunities to discuss the implementation of the Madrid International Plan of Action on Ageing, 2002, and take note of developments in regional multilateral processes on the elaboration of legal instruments. In that regard, during the present session we were informed of two crucial developments: the adoption in June 2015 of the Inter-American Convention on Protecting the Human Rights of Older Persons and the forthcoming adoption by the African Union of a protocol on the rights of older persons.

But as I mentioned before, identifying policy gaps or deficiencies in the implementation of the existing legal framework is only part of our task. We must think beyond that and explore measures that can be taken at the international level to remedy the lack of protection of the human rights of older persons.

This Working Group was the origin of several important initiatives. Let us recall, for example, that as a result of our discussions in previous sessions, the Human Rights Council established a special mechanism. For the second year in a row we have had the opportunity to interact with the Independent Expert Rosa Komfeld-Matte, whom I thank for her participation.

The mandate of the Independent Expert is complementary to the mandate of the Working Group, and there is no superposition or duplication. There is nothing in the mandate of the Independent Expert that alters the mandate of the Working Group, and in my opinion there is no need for us to wait for the final report of the Independent Expert in order to make progress in the implementation of what has been mandated to us by the General Assembly.

During the current session several delegations reiterated concrete proposals to address the gaps in implementation, information and monitoring that the Working Group has identified during the last four years. Among those proposals we can mention the following:

- (a) That treaty bodies incorporate in their respective mandates the issue of human rights of older persons, which would entail seeking information from States for inclusion in their periodic reviews in order to facilitate specific recommendations in their concluding observations and the highlighting of issues related to ageing in their general observations;
- (b) That the special procedures mechanisms of the Human Rights Council consider issues related to the human rights of older people in their mandates;
- (c) That Member States make the best use of the universal periodic review to address issues related to ageing;
- (d) That funds and programmes of the United Nations system and the specialized agencies systematically include targets and indicators related to older people;

(e) That Member States include language related to the rights of older persons in resolutions and documents of various intergovernmental bodies;

(f) That the rights of older persons be highlighted in the post-2015 development agenda. In that respect, we have had the opportunity to exchange views on the importance of designing adequate indicators. We are aware that the sustainable development goals are already agreed, so what we need now is a framework of indicators that is methodologically sound, relevant, measurable, timely, accessible and easy to interpret. The indicators should encompass all population groups and be age-sensitive. We need to disaggregate data and identify the indicators that are more suited to measure specifics relating to older persons;

(g) That a comprehensive compilation of all applicable legal instruments be made by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Those, I believe, are very concrete proposals that I strongly recommend be forwarded for action by the General Assembly and other relevant bodies. I hope that delegations will be open to considering those issues when we negotiate the specific resolution on ageing in the seventieth session of the Assembly.

Last year, in my closing remarks, I invited the Working Group to work in two parallel tracks: to continue identifying the gaps of implementation, and to start working on the elements of a new international legal instrument.

This year we have received a number of proposals containing concrete elements for an international legal instrument for the protection of the human rights of older persons. Those contributions, and others that we might receive in the upcoming months, could constitute the basis for our future work on a possible legal instrument.

I am fully aware that there are countries that would not like to talk about a convention, and I use the word “convention” deliberately because I am convinced that we should get used to saying it in this Working Group without misgiving.

At the same time I am also aware that an increasing number of delegations and a unanimous and clear voice coming from civil society are requesting us to undertake the task of elaborating a convention. Can we continue turning a deaf ear to those calls? Can we ignore that part of our mandate? My response to both questions is no. A clear no, simple and without ambiguities.

That is why I invite you all to start working on the text of a legal instrument.

We can debate whether this is the most fitting format in which to perform the negotiations, or if we should establish a special committee, an ad hoc working group or any other format. We can debate the modalities of such negotiations. We can debate the timing of the negotiations and the inputs that could be used as a basis for our future work.

What we cannot do is continue saying that the United Nations is not the place to negotiate a specific convention on the rights of older persons. The Organization has negotiated all human rights multilateral legal instruments that are currently in force. The approach we used to build this impressive human rights structure was progressive, but from the beginning the ultimate goal was to guarantee that the protection and promotion of human rights is for all human beings, without any kind of distinctions.

This, in my view, is the next natural step in the long path that began with the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on 10 December 1948.

I invite you to undertake this collective effort in favour of the more than one billion older persons of today and the more than six billion older persons of tomorrow. This cause should unite us and not divide us. We did it in the past; we can do it again now.

Before concluding, I would like to refer to the role of civil society and its participation in the proceedings of the Working Group. You have conveyed a clear message to us. I would like to assure you that we heard your positions and that we took note of your request to start the process of negotiating a convention.

We will continue to interact with, receive suggestions and seek advice from non-governmental organizations working with older persons. I would like to reiterate my suggestion that representatives of the civil society of our countries and regions be included in our national delegations.

In my opinion, the Working Group has clearly determined that multiple instances of violations of the human rights of older persons exist everywhere. Such violations should not be accepted or tolerated. We must now decide on how to translate that commitment into a more adequate framework for international protection. The result of the disablement of international norms is the lack of protection of the rights of older persons.

We should heed the words of Eleanor Roosevelt, who as you know was one of the driving forces behind the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, who said: “It is more intelligent to hope rather than to fear, to try rather than not to try. For one thing we know beyond all doubt: Nothing has ever been achieved by the person who says, ‘It can’t be done.’”
